

PERSONAL VALUE

Darry D Eggleston

We, each in our own way, have value.

That which we do, that which we say and that which we share adds to our value to others and to our self.

Perhaps one of the things that differentiate me from others is that I have recognized, recorded and given credit to some of the thoughts of those who aided in the creation of who I have become. I use more quotes than others because those quotes have had special value to me, and I offer them so that others might gain from them as well.

I go to great efforts to ensure that I do not take credit for the sharing of others, but — at the same time — rejoice in their sharing with me.

In my time, I have helped others grow into better people.

At the same time, exhibiting the same behaviors and sharing the same thoughts, I have aided others to be less than they could have been.

But I did not make their decisions in either case.

We, each using our own methods, decide who we will be and whom we will become. We must take credit for those decisions.

I am responsible for every decision that got me to where I am now, and I shall be responsible for those decisions which take me to wherever I am going.

I am the man I've become, the image I project, and the child I will always be.
